

Brotherhood.

Sharing likes, interests and/or routines generates a deep connection among people that can eventually become unbreakable, such as blood bonds would do. Brotherhood has always been in the interest of human kind. Every society has a sense of solidarity and friendship among its members, which leads to what we call brotherhood. People tend to use the term brotherhood instead of friendship because it implies a deeper sense of love and empathy. The fact that brothers tend to protect those from their own kind and origin more fiercely, explains how brotherhood appears to be the best term when referring to the relationship between close friends.

However, many sceptic persons think that neither friendship nor brotherhood exist. They consider people help and interact with others because they expect something in return.

Regardless contradictory points of view, the fact is that brotherhood is something that does matter in every society and, whether it is real or false, it represents the concept of mutual help amongst humans.
